EVALUATION CRITERIA

Applications are assessed on the content and relevance of the essay or video and reference form, demonstrated commitment to medicine, and engagement in student, medical or community settings.

Applicants must have existing ties or past efforts to work, study or volunteer with the following vulnerable or underserved populations: addiction and mental health, Indigenous communities, refugees and immigrants, rural or remote communities, people of diverse sexualities and genders, and home and long-term care.

SELECTION PROCESS

The Molloy Medicine Award selection committee is comprised of higher education professionals, representatives of AFMC, faculty members and community leaders.

Following the evaluation period, top-ranking candidates will be invited to participate in an asynchronous interview assessment. During this one-way interview, you will be asked to submit timed video responses to pre-recorded questions. Each question has a designated amount of prep and response time, and you can track your remaining time for each component on the screen. You can record your responses from anywhere you choose and at a time convenient to you before the deadline.

The entire process should take 20-30 minutes to complete. You will require a desktop or laptop computer with a functioning webcam, microphone, and internet connection.

Once complete, the selection committee's decision is final. All applicants will receive the results of the selection process by email.
